MANUSCRIPT DETAILS

TITLE: Women's participation in the post-liberal era: A global perspective

ABSTRACT: Scholars of comparative politics, gender, and world society have documented large worldwide increases in women's participation in the public sphere over recent decades. Women's participation in schooling expanded greatly. Women's suffrage spread from Europe to the globe. Women's rights and participation grew increasingly enshrined in state policy, and women took on central roles in governing bodies. And, of course, women entered the paid labor force en masse. Some scholars have argued that these changes follow broader trends in world society, especially its growing liberalism, which increasingly has reconfigured social life around the choices of empowered and rights-bearing individuals regardless of gender. Very recently, however, a variety of populisms and nationalisms have emerged to present alternatives to liberalism. We explore here their implications for women's participation in public life. We use cross-national data to analyze changes in women's participation in higher education, the polity, and the economy 1970–2017. We find enduring liberal tendencies but also that in the recent-most period countries linked to illiberal international organizations tend to be more tempered on these measures. We discuss implications for world society theory, which arose in a phase of expanding liberalism.
